

Travel Restrictions on China Coronavirus Outbreak

The governments of China and additional countries have implemented restrictions to slow the spread of coronavirus including limitations on entry and exit, visa and work permit issuance, closed ports, tightened quarantine rules, and other rules. These restrictions may affect international business travel and assignment plans.

The information displayed below is the most up-to-date that we have been able to gather from multiple sources around the world. Government responses, entry regulations, and quarantine rules may change at any time during this is a dynamic situation so please return to CIBTvisas.com for more information. If your destination is not listed below and you have been to China within the past 14 days or a country or a region affected by coronavirus you should expect additional questions upon entry, a medical evaluation, and may be denied entry.

We strongly recommend that anyone who has traveled to China recently consult with their transportation provider (airline, cruise, etc.) to ensure that he or she will be permitted boarding and entry into their destination before departing. We will continue to update this document as we gather more information.

China

Travel Restrictions

At present, except for the closure of the exit channel at Wuhan ports, all port visa agencies are operating as usual. Visa-free transit for foreigners is still effective, and all land, sea and air ports of China are functioning. Foreign and mainland Chinese nationals can enter or exit as usual with their valid international travel documents, although many other countries have adopted entry restrictions for travellers from mainland China (see below). Foreign nationals going to China to work are highly encouraged to enter with a Z (work) visa after having obtained the notification letter of work permit, rather than trying to obtain the notification letter of work permit while in China on a business (M) or tourist (L) visa. Those who fail to enter China within the validity of their Z visa due to the coronavirus are allowed to enter China with another type of visa. The Chinese employer should provide an explanation statement in support of the use of an alternative visa. Chinese immigration authorities will exempt foreign nationals whose temporary visas or residence permits expire during this period of disruption from penalties, or impose lighter penalties, depending on the circumstances. Newland Chase's team in China is available to provide guidance and assistance with renewals and de-registration. Most immigration offices in China have reopened as of 4 February, and the Wuhan authorities are due to resume work on 14 February. Holders of valid endorsements to Hong Kong, Macao or Taiwan who are affected by the epidemic and fail to enter the above places within the validity period can re-apply for certificates of the same type and validity period for free when the outbreak is over. In Shanghai, foreign nationals whose visas/stays/residence permits/passports expired within the past 10 days – including those whose employment in China ended – may visit the local immigration authorities to file their visa, stay, or residence permit extensions immediately after 10 February.

Travel Restrictions

Shanghai authorities have suspended the submission of physical documents for work permit applications (including initial, renewal, transfer, and cancellation). Instead, all applications will be processed online only during this period, with a commitment letter provided by the Chinese employer. The commitment letter should affirm the authenticity and validity of their online submission and original documents should be kept for further check. A similar online practice has been adopted in other regions in China, such as Beijing, Zhejiang and Guangdong.

In Beijing, immigration authorities are asking all foreign nationals and Chinese citizens to hold off submitting their visa/stay/residence permit applications in person if it is not urgent. Those who require urgent assistance with applications are encouraged to make appointment reservations in advance. As mentioned above, Beijing has adopted an online submission and commitment letter process for work permit renewals and cancellations.

In Shenzhen, immigration authorities have opened green channels for expedited applications for emergencies and urgent requests. The authorities have also implemented other convenient measures to facilitate visa applications for those remaining in Shenzhen during this outbreak period.

On 23 January, the government of Wuhan in Hubei province suspended all public transport and cancelled rail and air departures from the city. Hundreds of flights to and from Wuhan were cancelled. The travel ban has since been extended to several other cities in Hubei province.

Travel Restrictions

Vietnamese consular posts in mainland China and Hong Kong have stopped issuing visas (tourist or business) to all Chinese nationals and all other nationalities. Until further notice, no applications will be accepted.

For visa on arrival (VOA) pre-approval letters, requested at the immigration dept in Vietnam, foreign nationals (other than Chinese) need to prove that they are not coming from China.

Chinese nationals applying for Vietnamese visas from outside China may need to provide evidence (air tickets) that their travel to Vietnam will not originate from China, Hong Kong or Macau.

All flights between China and Vietnam have been cancelled. There may still be limited flights from and to Hong Kong and Taiwan.

From 5 February, the immigration department in Hanoi will temporarily stop granting visa on arrival (VOA) pre-approval letters for work and business purposes and for dependents. Only VOA for tourism purpose will be available, provided that the traveller is not travelling from China.

Foreign nationals already granted pre-approval letters for VOA for work or business purpose will still receive their visa upon arrival at the airport as normal but note that Chinese nationals may not be allowed to enter Vietnam.

For business and work purpose and for dependents, and whatever the nationality of the traveller, the visa pre-approval letter issued by the immigration department in Hanoi will only be possible with endorsement at the Vietnamese embassies/consulates abroad until further notice.

The Ho Chi Minh City (HCMC) immigration department has not as yet put in place similar restrictions. However, the labour department in HCMC has suspended new work permit applications and renewals or reissuing for Chinese nationals.
